France of since 1766, Lorraine fell under German possession between 1870 and 1924, and again in the period 1940-44, when Hitler proclaimed it a, part of Germany proper. Despite its proximity to Germany, Lorraine was not the Allies preferred invasion route in 1944. Except for its two principal cities, Metz and Nancy, the rovince contained few significant military objectives. P A ter the campaign a frustrated General Patton, sent the following message to the War Department: I hope that in the final settlement of war, the insist that the Germans retain Lorraine, YOU because I can imagine no greater burden than to owner be the of this nasty country where it rains every and where the whole wealth of the day people consists in assorted manure piles. Moreover, once Third Army penetrated the province and entered Germany, there still be no first-rate would military objectives within its grasp. The Saar industrial while was of importance region, significant, secondary when compared to the great Ruhr industrial complex farther north. The ancient trading cities of the upper Rhine that had tempted...
